"Hello my Glorious King" bowed Queen Shahrazad as her husband entered the room. "We just lost another war!" boomed the King, shaking his head and thumping his foot on the intricate mosaic floor. "At least your country isn't like King Ayat's Kingdom in the story of Princess Rizah and the King of Mercy," spoke the Queen in a delicate tone. "Tell me the story at once!" shouted the angry ruler. "To here you is to obey," came the reply as she began.

Years ago there was a country as rich and happy as can be.

The houses were made of marble and were lined with fine mosaic floors that dazzled in the golden blazing sunlight. The roofs were intricately made by their famous craftsmen to display their beautiful patterns.

In the centre of this country was the city of Baghdad. In the middle ^{of the} city stood a resplendent Palace. Its high walls encased the glorious building as lushias waterfalls flowed into enchanting crystal pools.

Here lived King Ayat, his wife, Queen Yasmin and their delightful daughter, Princess Rizah.

It was a stormy night. The wind was blowing
